

---

The editor has acquired a British postal stationery envelope, used in 1897, which has the Perfin A&N/CSL perforated through the embossed stamp, but not through the back of the envelope. This would indicate that the perforation was done before the envelope was folded and glued together. Either that or a most peculiar Perfin device was in use. Who can shed further light on this?